Topics of the Week

THE past week will be historic in the moral, as well as the judicial, history of France. It marks Light an the triumph not merely of truth over judicial Right error or of poetic justice over a singularly audacious and unscrupulous conspiracy, but also of moral principles in a great social and political conflict in which the honour and good repute of the French ration have been at stake. Justice, tardy, but, we hope and believe, full, is at last to be rendered to the unhappy Alfred Dreyfus. That he was the victim not only of a judicial error, but of a wicked reactionary conspiracy, is now generally recognised. The so-called patriots who counted on the stupidity or knavery of the judges of the highest tribunal in the country to obstruct the march of truth, have been disappointed, for, as we write, Revision is on the point of being pronounced by the Court of Cassation. All the elaborate efforts to obscure the real issue, all the exquisite dialectics by which M. Cavaignac sought to compensate for lack of evidence, all the threats of the generals, and the fulminations of fanatics, have proved unavailing. There are still judges in France, as there were in Berlin in the days of the autocratic Frederic, and these judges have shown that they are worthy of their ermine and of the great trust reposed in them by the nation. The work of reparation of which the Court of Cassation has become the instrument is of an importance far exceeding the limits of the Dreyfus case in its judicial aspects. Those who have followed the case intently cannot have failed to note that it has been seized upon as an excuse and an occasion for a struggle of far-reaching social and political scope. If the whole nation has taken part in it, it has not been because everybody was equally interested in the fate of Dreyfus. The reason is that it has set in motion great social forces, and that, over the prison-house of the unfortunate Jew, a violent struggle has been waged between the military and civil powers, between sectarian hate and Liberal tolerance, between the gospel of Authority and the evangel of Right. For months the Republic has trembled in fear of a military Dictator. There have been fanatics who have not scrupled to talk of a new Saint Bartholomew. Defenders of a crime on the score of expediency have stood forth unabashed. In this great struggle the course of Light and Right and the principles which made pleasant the dawn of the century have at length been vindicated. How great this triumph is only those can know who have felt the pulse of the reactionary forces at work, and have seen closely and how desperately they fought. It is not too much to say that in the Dreyfus case the principles not only of French justice, but of French political liberty have been strikingly vindicated. The battle has redounded to the credit of the French people in another way. The courage, the enthusiasm for high ideals, the spirit of self-sacrifice shown by such men as Zola, Clémenceau, Jaurès, Picquart and Dreyfus have illustrated the nobler side of the French character, and have created a fine tradition of conduct for coming generations of Frenchmen. One almost hesitates to be sorry that there should have been a Dreyfus case when one reflects on the impulse it has given to the better instincts of Evidence continues to accumulate that those cheery people who expressed an optimist view of the Anglo-Russian Agreement spoke too hastily. Instead of diminishing the friction between the two Powers in the Far East, it appears to have produced precisely the contrary effect. It is no longer open to question that Russia, having secured a good base in Manchuria, and a pretty firm grip on Pekin itself, is now pushing down south towards the Yangtse Valley. Not content with that, either, her representative has just forbidden the Tsungli-Yamen to permit the construction of a projected line from the south. The object of these somewhat startling manœuvres is plain enough; our great rival is striving to draw the vast trade of the Yangtse basin to that part of China which seems destined to fall eventually under Russian control. Ostensibly, the British sphere of interest would be left alone, but it would have about as much value as the skin of a sucked orange. It may be taken for granted, therefore, that our Government will insist on retaining the right of way granted to the Pekin Syndicate by the Tsung-J-Yamen some time back for the very line which M. de Witte forbids. It would simply ruin our future trade with the Southern Celestials were their commerce diverted from its natural outlets on the littoral.

the nation, and on the vindication it has enabled it to accomplish of principles which lie at the root of social well-being and of all moral progress.

In Parliament

BY H. W. LUCY

The appearance of the House of Commons since work was resumed lends some colour to the quaint suspicion that Ministers will find a difficulty in keeping the House open into the first week in August. It is an old device of the managers of Government business to put down Supply as the first Order of the Day on the resumption of sittings after a holiday. What Ministers care least to see in such circumstances is a big House. As a rule the more members present in Committee of Supply the fewer votes are snatched. The contrary holds good, and the most cheerful spectacle the Secretary to the Treasury can view when the House ge's into Committee of Supply is a waste of empty benches.

On the eve of the adjournment for the Recess Mr. Arthur Balfour improved upon the ordinary procedure. He not only put down Supply for Thursday and Friday in this week, but he carefully excluded Irish votes and other controversial matters. His strategy would doubtless be rewarded by the clearance of whole blocks of votes, any couple of which would in the good old days, when Mr. Eiggar was paramount, have sufficed to keep things going through a long sitting.

In spite of the hearty goodwill shown to Mr. Robson's Half-Tim-rs' Bill, which carried it triumphantly through the second reading, Wednesday's sitting was looked forward to not without apprehension. Not only was it Derby Day but a brilliant summer day. Whether members would give up to the children what was meant for mankind at Epsom was a question of some gravity. In the event it turned out that duty was placed above pleasure. From the moment the Speaker took the Chair apprehension of failure through a count out disappeared. A division taken within the first hour disclosed the presence of over 170 members. This increased as the afternoon sped, till towards the close of the sitting the House presented an appearance rare on a Wednesday, unprecedented on a Derby Day.

The Opposition, when it risked the disclosure of the Division

The Opposition, when it risked the disclosure of the Division Lobby, was found to be absolutely insignificant. Once the minority ran up as far as sixty-three; but it was oftener under a score. It was composed almost exclusively of Lancashire members, though in one of the divisions Lord Cranborne, most unwillingly, as he admitted, voted in support of an amendment reducing the age of half-timers to eleven and a half instead of twelve as proposed by the Bill. Mr. Robson had cleverly "nolibled" the agricultural members by a proviso clause which made it possible for children in agricultural districts to work in the fields in summer, making up their school time in winter. The only danger to the Bill was prolongation of the debate carrying it over the limited hours practicable at a Wednesday sitting. On this plan of campaign the small force of obstructionists won. By the aid of the Closure, moved just before half-past five, Mr. Robson was able to carry through Committee the one clause of the Bill. But there remained a series of new clauses, and so the affair stands over.

The Queen and Ber People

BIRTHDAY congratulations to the Queen are still the order of the day. London keeps the Royal birthday officially to-day (Saturday) with all the usual pomp and ceremony of trooping the colour at the Horse Guards, official banquets and receptions, salutes in the Parks, much bell-ringing, flag-flying, and the customary isluminations. One special feature of the celebration has been the unanimity with which all nationalities and creeds under the Queen's rule have joine I in congratulations.

A hearty Highland welcome awaited the Queen on her arrival at Balmoral on Saturday. The Balmoral Highlanders were drawn up in two lines to welcome the Royal party at the gates, and as soon as the Royal carriage appeared Her Majesty's Commissioner, Mr. James Forbes, came forward with a few words of welcome. Her Majesty was delighted with her greetings, and added to her thanks the remark, "I am pleased to be amongst you again in my Highland home." The short speech raised hearty cheers, and a procession was then formed to the Castle, the pipers marching in front playing Scotch airs. Princess Beatrice will not be in Scotland this spring, as she has gone on a short visit to Germany, taking her second son, Prince Leopold. After a course of waters at Kissingen the Princess will pay a round of family visits, staying with Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg at Heiligenberg, with her sister-inlaw, the Countess von Erbach, at Castle Schönberg and with the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg at Rosenau in the Thüringian Forest.

With the Prince and Princess of Wales once more at Marlborough I ouse and taking their share in Court functions, the London season grows much brighter. The Princess was at the Opera for the first time this season on Saturday night, occupying the Royal box with Princess Victoria to hear the Meistersingers, while the Prince and the Duke of York were in the onnibus box. The Prince had come back to town that day from Yarmouth. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, the Duke and Duchess of York, and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg were at the German Chapel Royal for the morning Service, and afterwards lunched together, while in the afternoon the Prince and Princess Victoria with the Duke and Duchess went to the Zoo. Next day the Prince of Wales held a Levée, when the attendance was extremely large, some 2,000 gentlemen being present with 800 presentations—a record number. It was a "Collar Day."

Afterwards the Prince accompanied Princess Victoria and the Grand Duke of Hesse, with a large party, to the Military Tournament. Epsom races have, of course, claimed the Prince on the succeeding days, but the Princesses have not been present this year. There was the usual Derby dinner at Marlborough House on Wednesday, and another night the Prince was presiding at the annual banquet of the 10th Hussars. The State Concert was fixed for last (Friday) night. Princess Charles of Denmark is still staying with her parents, but she has been slightly indisposed and unable to go out much.

This month will see another Royal wedding, the marriage of the Crown Prince of Montenegro with the Duchess Jutta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz being fixed for June 30. It is not all quite smooth sailing for the Royal lovers, as the bride-elect has decided to adopt her future husband's faith, and enter the Greek Church, so the Mecklenburgers—rigid Lutherans—are highly indignant at what they consider their Princess's apostacy.

"Stand by."-CAPTAIN CUTTLE

By J. ASHBY-STERRY

An interesting account and picture of Dotheboys Hall in The Daily Graphic-from which I learn that the contents of the notable building have recently dispersed—reminds me of a pleasant visit ! made to the place a few years ago. There is scarcely a spot in Dickensland that I have not visited—I began my travels in that fascinating country at the age of ten—and there is no place so little changed as Bowes in Yorkshire. Save the absence of coaches and the disappearance of the notorious schools, the village can have altered but little since Charles Dickens paid his famous visit to the place in 1838. It was a lovely August day when I found myself in this quarter, but I could imagine what a bleak, unsheltered, hopely-place it must be in snowtime. I was especially warned that I may place it must be in snowtime. I was especially warned that I must not say anything about Dotheboys Hall, or I might find myself under the village pump. I, however, had the place pointed out to me, and I gazed upon the front of it and then went round and inspected the back of it, every moment expecting to be interviewed by an irate proprietor. However, I was unmolested, and had plenty of time to recognise the celebrated pump and the wondrons accuracy of the description in "Nicholas Nickleby." Indeed I was accuracy of the place of the village and the surrounding struck with this, both as regards the village and the surrounding country. I was shown in the churchyard the tombs of those said to be the originals of Mr. and Mrs. Squeers, young Wackford and Fanny. Subsequently I had lunch at the "Unicorn," I think, and the landlord told me his mother recollected seeing Charles Dickens in Bowes. I afterwards took my way along the road to Greta Bridge-where Nicholas and Squeers drove in the pony-chaise that dismal night-and presently bore away to the right, through High Startforth, and eventually reached picturesque Barnard Castle. On arriving there I was hot and somewhat exhausted. I then recollected that Newman Noggs said, "If you should go to Barnari Castle there is excellent ale at the King's Head." You may be sure I did not lose a moment in availing myself of his admirable suggestion.

A correspondent of the Times says :- "If pedestrians wish to cross the Thames at Charing Cross (Hungerford Bridge) they now have to descend a steep street and climb a flight of steep wooden steps-a quite unnecessary labour, since the bridge is on an exact level with Charing Cross Station, and should be approachable through it. As the South-Eastern Railway is about to expand the station the public should have this slight accommodation." I called attention to this matter in this column more than three years ago, and demonstrated how easily the matter might be accomplished. As far as I understand, the principal enlargement of the station will take place on the western side, so unless some agitation is made on the subject the public will have to go on enduring the same inconvenience to which they have submitted for over thirty years. What the authorities were about when the railway company was permitted to take over the bridge that they did not insist upon a direct communication with the Strand is altogether difficult to understand. A light iron balcony outside the station wall, extending from the wooden steps to the stone steps leading to Charing Cross Station, would effectually answer all purposes, and would in no wise encroach on the space of the terminus. On the Surrey side the encroach on the space of the terminus. On the Surrey side the descent from Hungerford Bridge to the Belvedere Road is badly planned and inconvenient. It would have been much better to have continued the footpath by the side of the railway to Waterloo Stat'on, with staircases at suitable intervals.

And this leads one to propose that a new advantage for foot-passengers—the most numerous and important class, but always the last to be considered—might be easily carried out. Why should there not be light iron balconies attached to all the railway viaducts that traverse London, with staircases leading to the principal streets they cross? There would be no great engineering difficulty about this, and it would be an immense boon to the pedestrians. Railways usually go the most direct route from one place to another in London. Hence the foot-passengers would be able to take a short cut without fear of being run over. It would be a saving of time and of money, to say nothing of the advantage of walking for a time in a better atmosphere. I commend this suggestion to the immediate attention of the County Council.

Everyone at the present moment—whether heknows anything about the subject or not—whether his name conveys weight or the reverse—seems compelled to say his say, write letters in newspapers, enter protests, and otherwise distinguish himself by delivering his opinions with regard to the decorations of Saint Paul's Cathedral. The most remarkable part of the whole business is—especially looking at the time the decorations have been in hand—that it is only within the last few months that anybody has troubled himself on the subject. Without going thio the question in dispute, it appears to me, that if the voices of the objectors had been raised earlier, everyone would have been spared a great dial of trouble, and any mistake might have been more easily obviated. One way and another I have had a good deal to say on Saint Paul's at different times. It is a good while ago since I wrote an article entitled "The Uncathedrality of the Cathedral," in which I had something to say with regard to the Restoration Fund, and I trusted that the money would not be frittered away in squabbles, and I hazarded my conviction that the battle of tuste would be a somewhat heree one.

My suggestion that when the houses of notable people are pulled down a record of the fact should be indelibly inscribed on the pavement opposite to the demolished mansion, might well be carried out in the case of Joseph Mallord William Turner. Who passing through Maiden Lane, Covent Garden, nowadays could point out where stood the barber's shop where the greatest of all landscape and the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of all landscapes and the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of all landscapes are the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of all landscapes are the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of all landscapes are the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood of the barber's shop where the greatest of the stood o landscape painters was born nearly a century and a quarter ago? / could, because at one time I wrote a chronicle of this laneformerly one of the most picturesque thoroughfares in Londonand took a great deal of trouble to find out about its inhabitants. But, probably, there is not one person in a thousand who passes through the lane knows that the great artist ever was associated with it. If the fact were indicated by a stone with a suitable inscription thereon in the footway immediately opposite the site of the house referred to, it would not only fix the spot before it is forgotten, but would lend an extra interest to a thoroughfare that is rapidly becoming reduced to the commonplace character of other London streets.

Our Portraits

SENOR EMILIO CASTELAR, whose death was announced from Madrid last week, was a man of European reputation both as a statesman and an orator. He was born in 1832, and at an early age took a very active part in the political controversies of his country, and wrote a great deal for newspapers with advanced opinions. In 1864 he founded a newspaper called the Democra, y, in which he set forth his political ideas. In 1866 he took part in the revolutionary rising which was suppressed by Serrano, and being condemned to death, fled to Geneva. When the Revolution of 1868 broke out Señor Castelar returned to Spain, and became a leader of the Democratic party. He demanded the proclamation of a Republic, and protested against the restoration of the monarchy. But although he carried on an active campaign in the provinces, the Republicans were beaten at the polls, and the Duke of Aosta was proclaimed King in 1870 under the title of Amadeus I. Two years later the King abdicated. Señor Castelar became Premier and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and a Republic was proclaimed. Señor Castelar had no easy task before him, for he had to combat the insubordination of the generals and a Carlist rising. These difficulties he faced unflinchingly, but dissensions in his own Cabinet caused him to resign. With him fell the Republic, and Alphonso XII. was pro-claimed King. After the restoration Señor Castelar became Chief of the Republican party, and to the last he remained the foremost exponent of Liberal ideas in Spain. Lately, however, he had ceased to exercise much influence in politics. He wrote many books-histories, essays, and travelsw. ich have been widely read in Europe and America.

Sir George Gabriel Stokes has just attained the rare distinction of occupying a chair at a University for half a century, and the event has been duly celebrated at Cambridge, where he has spent so much of his life. Sir Gabriel Stokes is the son of the Rev. Gabriel Stokes, rector of Skreen, County Sligo, and was born in 1819. He was educated first at Dublin and Bristol, and then at Pembroke College, Cambridge. At the University he had a most distinguished career, being Senior Wrangler and First Smith's Prizeman in 1841, in which year his college made him a Fellow. He vacated his Fellowship on his marriage, in 1857, but was re-elected in 1867. In 1849 he was appointed Lucasian Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge, and has held that Society from 1854 to 1825 in which year he became President, and held that office for five years. In 1869 he was President of the British Association. From 1887 to 1892 he represented his University in the Houseof Commons, sitting as a Conservative. He was created a baronet in 1889.—Our portrait is by Window and Grove, Baker Street.

who has settled at Skibs Castle, Ardgay, N.B., is credited with the philanthropic intention of distributing most of his wealth in his lifetime. He has just given 50,000% to the Midland University. Mr. Carnegie, the "Iron King" as he is called, is a Scotsman by birth, having been born in Dunfermline in 1855. His family took him to the United States when he was ten years old, and two years later he began his business career by attending a small stationary engine in Pitsburgh. Then he became a telegraph messenger, and later he was appointed an operator. While later he was appointed an operator. While clerk to the superintendent of Pennsylvania Railroad Company, he aided in the adoption by that company of the Woodruff sleeping car, and this was the beginning of his great success. He was made superintendent of the Pittsburg division of the Pennsylvania road, and soon afterwards acquired an interest in some oil wells that proved very profitable. Subsequently he became associated with others in establishing a rolling mill, which grew to be the largest and most complete system of iron and steel industries in the world ever controlled by one individual. Besides these enterprises Mr. Carnegie is the owner of a number of English newspapers of Radical views. Mr. Carnegie is well known for his philanthropy, and has given away large sums for educational and charitable purposes, especially in Scotland.-Our portrait is by W. Crooke, Edinburgh.

Mr. Peter Nicol Russell, the wealthy Australian now residing in this country, is a prominent man in New South Wales. In Sydney, where his home is, he is especially well known for his generous philanthropy. He founded the School of Engineering in the University of Sydney. Mr. Russel enjoys the unusual distinction of having his portrait twice in the same exhibition at the Royal Academy. One of thes: is by Mr. W. Q. Orchardson, R.A., and is an oil painting. It is from this picture that our portrait of Mr. Russell is reproduced. The other figures on medals by Mr. Allan Wyon.

His departure from New York was the occasion of a great display of enthusiasm by his friends and supporters. Mr. Croker has recently been before the Mazet Committee which was appointed by the State Legislature to inquire into the municipal corruption of New York City. Mr. Croker admitted practically that he was the ruler of New York. His control over Tammany was complete, and the nominees of Tammany were his nominees. He selected the Mayor and all the other chief candidates whom the people elected, and they were all obedient to his will. Even the judges owed their appointment to him.-Our portrait is by Edsall.

Sir George Augustus Pilkington, who has just been returned to Parliament as a Liberal for the Southport Division of Lancashire, to till the vacancy caused by the death of Sir Herbert Naylor-Leyland, is a son of Mr. Robert Gorton Combe, surgeon, of Burnham, Essex, and was born in 1848. He was educated for the medical profession at Guy's Hospital, obtaining his M.R.C.S. and L.S.A. in 1870. He practised medicine in Southport from 1870 to 1884. He married in 1876 Mary Elizabeth, the only daughter of Mr. James Pilkington, L.P. and D.L. Comparts for a process M. After a time she threw herself into her art, and at the age of nineteen made her debut in the Salon of 1841 with two little pictures called "Two Rabbits" and "Goats and Sheep." Another to study cattle she went to the slaughter-houses and their neighbourhood, to study horses to the horse market; but horsey characters are not always respectfully predisposed towards a modest, well-tay-end young girl, nor are provincial butchers the most delicate in chosen word and habit. The crowd that gathered impeded her, their criticisms flamed her cheeks; she, therefore, had recurre to stratagem, and adopted the blouse and trousers of the crisus, which in her own home she retained the use of to her dying day.

SIR G. A. PILKINGTON

To this training we owe her wonderful insight in the rendering of animals and her weakness in the representation of landscape. She nearly always found extreme difficulty in her backgrounds, and even in the setting of her chief subjects in their landscape surroundings, so that they might be one with them, she never showed great facility. The fault, too, was not one of deficient interest in landscape merely, but in a certain poverty of colour which at sine herent and remained to the end. Yet the blemish was rarely sine. Although not so a ent as Morland, as powerful as James Ward, or as vigorous in liof colour as Mr. Briton Kiviere, she was broader than Bras and far more natural than Landseer. She never storyhumanising her beasts; there was neither supernatural intelli-

"DIE MEISTERSINGER" AT THE OPERA

THE first Wagner cycle ended on Saturday, but a fresh series special German performances commenced on Monday, when the Meistersinger, which had been given on Saturday night, was again performed. The early repetition of Wagner's only comic opera was rendered necessary by the engagement of Herr Scheidemantel, who came over from Germany expressly to play his famous part of Hans Sachs, but who had only a week's congé from his duties at Dresden, and, accordingly, had to leave London again on Tuesday. His visit, though short, was very welcome, as he is certainly one of the finest impersonators we have yet had of the Huif, honest, and warm-hearted German cobbler poet. He is a better singer than M. Lassalle, and a better actor than M. Edouard de Reszké, with whose names the character is chiefly associated in England, at any rate to those too young to recollect Herr Gura, a vocalist by the way, who is again returning to London this month to sing the lieder of Schubert and Carl Löwe. Indeed, Saturday's performance was one of the finest we have had of Die Meistersinger in London. Frau Gadski, particularly, was a charming representative of Eva, vivacious in the scenes with her lover, though demure enough in the church scene in the first act, and most diverting in her wheedling of Hans Sachs in the second act. Mr. Hispham rather exaggerated the character of Beckmesser, a part which far too easily lends itself to pantomime. But, on the other hand, quite a new reading was given to the two characters of the prentice and his sweetheart by Herr Schramm and Frau Schumann-Heink, the latter developing a vein of humour which could hardly be expected from the typical representative of Ortrud and Fricka.

RETURN OF MADAME MELBA

Madame Melba wisely postponed her re-appearance from the eve of Whit Sunday to last Thursday, when a brilliant audience assembled to welcome her back. She selected Juliette for her antrée, singing the music brilliantly (although the waltz was a little out of tune), and acting with far more vivacity than she used to. M. Saléza was still rather out of voice owing to the recent declement weather, but M. Edouard de Reszké, who now made his test appearance this season, was again a noble representative of Friar Lawrence. On Tuesday Madame Melba played Marguerite for the first time this season, and on Saturday that now quite out of tate opera, Lucia, will be revived for her.

ROYAL HONOURS FOR THE SINGERS

M. Jean de Reszké has been invested by the Queen with the Fourth Class of the Royal Victorian Order, an honour hitherto manded to only two musicians, namely, Sir Arthur Sullivan and Signor Tosti. The Queen gave M. Edouard a silver goblet, and the Madage Mandale who slowed to Window and France Control of the Madage Mandale who slowed to Windows and France Control of the Madage Mandale who slowed to Windows and France Control of the Madage Mandale who slowed the Windows and France Control of the Mandale who slowed the Windows and France Control of the Con and to Madame Nordica, who slept at Windsor, and Frau Schumann-Heink jewelled brooches. The artists who sang in the previous week in The Hymn of Praise before the Queen have likewise received presents, the eminent English tenor, Mr. Edward Lloyd, having a huge silver inkstand and writing set, engraved with the Royal Arms.

There will be yet another Royal performance at Windsor Castle when the Court returns from Balmoral. When the Queen was in the Riviera Signor Leoncavallo appeared before her, and Her Majesty promised to command him to Windsor in the course of the season. Accordingly the composer will come to England early in July, when his Pagliacci will be performed in the Waterloo Gallery by the artists of the Royal Opera. As Signor Puccini will then also be in England, it is not improbable that he will conduct in the same programme a performance of his Cavalleria Rusticana.

Toy Bog Show

THE great Toy Dog Show opened at the Crystal Palace this week

attracted many visitors. The show was not altogether restricted to animals of the toy class, as a great many large dogs were exhibited. Ladies assembled in strong force to look after their pets on exhibition. These for the most part reposed on silk cushions or the softest of rugs, and it was only a few that: were relegated to straw. In many cases they were fed by their owners, but when this was not the case they were looked after by the attendants of the Palace. May Queen II., Mrs. Graves's Blenheim bitch, which has already won over 150 prizes, was again p ominent among the successful animals, and won first prizes and a championship.

The final Stage of the Dregins Case

THE Cour de Cassation, which has been considering the question of revising the Dreyfus case, is the highest Court of Appeal in France, and consists of three Presidents of Chamber and fortyfive Councillers, all of them appointed aut vita aut culpi, and irremovable. The Court has also, as Migistrat du Parquet, a Procurator General and six Advocates-General. The First President is M. Mazeau, who was appointed in 1890. The Procurator-General is M. Manau. The Court is divided into three Chambers—the Chamber des Requêtes (Petitions), the Civil Chamber and Criminal Chamber. Each of these consists of a President, fifteen Councillors, two Advocates-General and a Greffier, or Clerk of the Court. The President of the Chambre des Requêtes is M. Tanon, who was appointed in 1893, that of the Civil Chamber, M. Ballot Beaupré (appointed in 1883), the successor of M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire (whose thea-trical resignation caused such a sensation), and that of the Criminal Chamber is M. Loew, who re-ceived his appointment in 1896.

The Hall in which the whole Court has been sitting to deliberate over the Dreyfus case is a sumptuous though small building. Sculptured figures, fine paintings, and an imposing picture of the Crucifixion adorn the walls, while the ceiling is

M. BALLOT BEAUPRÉ beautifully decorated. Reporter on the Dreyfus Case to the Cour de Cassation The Dreyfus case has been so long before us that it is useful to be reminded of some of the leading facts. The case, it will be remembered, was referred to the Cour de Cassation last September after the ccurt-martial of Esterhazy, the two trials of M. Zola, the confession and suicide of Colonel Henry, the arrest of Colonel Picquart, and other events had thrown a flood of light upon the kind of justice that had been meted out to the unhappy Dreyfus. Then at length M. Brisson succeeded in obtaining a majority within his Cabinet in favour of the revision of the Dreyfus case. The whole matter was then referred to the Criminal Chamber of the Cour de Cassation. The reporter or councillor entrusted with the summary of the evidence was M. Bard. Then followed M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire's resignation and accusations against M. Loew and M. Bard. M. Mazeau, the First President of the Cour de Cassation, was ordered by the Government to inquire into the truth of M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire's accusations. M. Mazeau, after hearing evidence given in support of and against M. de Beaurepaire's allegations, gave in his report to the Government, who decided, on his recommendations, that the case should be referred to the whole Cour de Cassation, and that it should not be left to the Criminal Chamber alone to decide on the matter, although M. Beaurepaire cast no reflection on the honour of that Chamber. M. Mazeau, the First President of the Cour d. Cassation, thereupon made M. Ballot Beaupré reporter of the case. He has this week read his report, and the conclusion he has arrived at is that ex-Captain Dreyfus should be sent for trial again before a court-martial. The scene in court during the reading of the report was most impressive. The judges in their robes and the small body of the general public who were admitted by ticket all listened intently to M. Ballot Beaupré, who read his report in a very clear and emphatic manner. He caused a sensation in Court by stating Esterhazy, and not by Dreyfus. When he concluded his speech with a voice tremulous with emotion the spectators forgot that they were in the highest Court of Justice in France and burst into cheers.

A QUINQUENNIAL CENSUS for the United Kingdom is being suggested. Not only other European countries number their people every five years, but several of the British colonies, so that it is rather an anomaly for the Mother Country to take only a decennial census.

EDITING A NEWSPAPER IN SERVIA is a decidedly anxious occupation. One weekly journal has had sixteen editors in two years, fifteen of the number being now in prison for commenting too plainly upon Government policy.

"It is my duty to warn you, Mr. Bates," said he, "that we have precise instructions with regard to any future predicament in which English travellers may be landed through their own foolhardiness. not know where Segesta is, never having been privileged to gaze upon its doubtle.s striking monuments of antiquity; but I had been given to understand that it could be reached in considerably less than two hours from Calatafimi. Consequently, I began, after a time, to feel misgivings, and I was in the act of imparting these to my companion when, on a sudden, a shout rang out through the to my companion when, on a state in a solut rang out though the still, sultry air, and at the same moment I became aware that a gleaming gun-barrel was being pointed straight at my head over the top of an adjacent boulder.

"Told you so!" I exclaimed. "Now

The Professor shrugged his shoulders.
"Are you armed?" he asked.
"I have a revolver," I answered.
"Then, my dear sir, let me implore you, if you value your life, not to dream of using it."

How could I use it when there was nothing to fire at? And although I might, and no doubt should, have hit a brace or more of the dozen unkempt ruffians who instantly sprang out of the bowels of the earth to surround us, it was obvious that subsequent escape would have been a sheer impossibility. So the Professor and I were fain to surrender at discretion, to the manifest delight of our so-called guide, who grinned from ear to ear.

His confederates did not grin. They were as sullen and ill-looking a crew as ever I have beheld in my life; and from the needless violence with which they dragged me out of the saddle and bound my arms behind my back, I gathered that they had little in common with the courteous banditti of romance. No such rough usage was romance. accorded accorded to the Professor, who addressed a few rapid sentences to them in the Sicilian dialect, unintelligible to me, and who was neither bound nor forced to dismount. "Then, upon my word," said I, not best pleased, "I think you might have been a little less communicative and officious! This means, I suppose, that you will get off scot-free and that I shall have to pay an extortionate price for my liberty. I congratulate you upon your presence of mind."

The Professor smiled benignly. "A la overre comme à la guerre!" he march that followed. Much I cared whether we were traversing classic ground or not; and a poor sort of solace quotations from Theocritus were to a man whose arms were aching and throbbing under the pressure of a tight cord.

"Look here," I said at last, "it seems to me that, as this costly expedition is being carried out at my expense, I may fairly claim to be dealt with as indulgently as you are. Can't you suggest to your ruffianly friends that I want to blow my nose?"

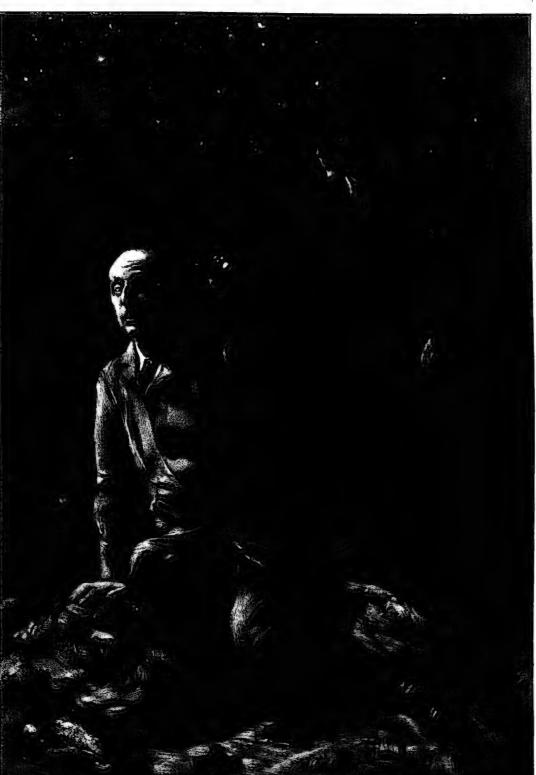

"To be sure I can, and so I will," he good-humouredly replied; but the representations which he at once addressed to the scoundrel who appeared to be in command of our captors failed to produce the desired effect.

"You see, Mr. Bates," he explained, "you are a powerful man, whereas I am but a feeble old fellow, incapable of showing fight or attempting to escape. They say you must wait a little longer. When we reach the white building which you can see yonder on the hillside, and which, it seems, is tenanted by a widow, who will, perhaps, offer us a drink of the country wine —"

"And who is doubtless in the swim," I interrupted.

"Eh! poverina!—what would you have? In these parts one must take one side or the other, and it would go hard with a lonely woman who favoured the carabinieri. Well, as soon as we reach

"'You had better not move! That cold, hard substance which you feel behind your ear is the barrel of your own nice, new revolver, and my finger is upon the trigger'"

But Professor Abbattucci laughed these sage counsels to scorn. "Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator," he quoted; "it is not out of the carcase of a poor devil of a pedagogue that Signor Guercio will make his fortune, and I am not afraid of him. As for Mr. Bates, who is rich and has a right to be careful of his person, not for the world would I lead him into danger. Let him remain here quietly to-morrow; I venture to promise that I will rejoin him, safe and sound, before nightfall."

Now. I am not what any impartial person could call rich, nor, safe and sound, before nightfall."

Now, I am not what any impartial person could call rich, nor, I trust, am I what any impartial person would call a coward. My reply was just what yours (assuming you to represent the average human being) would have been in my place, and on the following morning the train took the Professor and me to the station of Calatafimi, where we found two horses waiting for us, under the charge of a bronzed, bearded contadino, who had been instructed to act as our guide. #### CHAPTER II.

THEY proved as good as their word. My revolver was taken from me when we came to a halt in front of the low, rambling structure, my arms were set free, and why I was allowed to retain possession of my watch and my spare cash it was not for me to inquire. As for attempting to escape, I might as well have attempted to soar into the air, like an eagle. Instead of essaying the impossible, I sat blinking in the fierce sunlight, like an owl, and hoped that the extremely pretty little woman who tripped out with bottles and glasses just as if she had been expecting us—as a matter of fact, I suppose she had been expecting us—would not forget me in her kindly ministrations.

She did not forget the Professor, anyhow. He had three tumblers of wine, no less, and they evidently exhilarated him. Also he conof wine, no less, and they evidently exhilarated him. Also he conversed in an animated style with our fair entertainer, even going so far as to address her (my very limited acquaintance with the dialect enabled me to detect that much) as "Cecchina mia." I had already heard her called "Signora Cecchina" by the leader of the gang. Well, she was amiable enough to end by offering me refreshment; although at the moment when she did so, her eyes were turned away from me towards some distant object. She pointed, indeed, to a small cloud of dust mean the white road for hereath us and to a small cloud of dust upon the white road far beneath us, and uttered an exclamation which instantly caused every one of us to gaze eagerly in the direction indicated. It was only a country cart, as was at once perceived; but the very brief space of time during which Cecchina contrived to elude observation sufficed for her purpose. She pressed a small round object into my hand, whispering, in clearly intelligible Italian, "South-south-west," and, as I hurriedly pocketed the compass, I said to myself, "Thank you, my dear ; I'll remember."

The significance and value of this excellent woman's gift became more apparent to me when a thick bandage was placed over my eyes and the march was resumed. How long that march lasted I cannot say; it seemed to me to be absolutely interminable, and my repeated inquiries of the Professor as to whether he also had been blindfolded or not met with no answer. Could the unfeeling wretch have persuaded those villains to let him depart in peace, as a worthless asset? Somehow, I felt no confidence in him, and inclined to the belief that, if he could save his own skin, he would trouble himself little enough about the integrity of mine.

These apprehensions, however, turned out to be groundless. When at length I was lifted off my horse and my bandage was removed, the first object upon which my dized eyes fell was the figure of the Professor, who was standing before me with his hands

"Well, Mr. Bates," said he, in slightly mocking accents, "how do you find yourself by this time?"

Vague suspicions had been floating through my brain for several hours past: these crystallised themselves into precise shape as I stared at my interlocutor, planted there in the twilight, with a background of jagged rocks and ragged rascals to emphasize the circumstance that he was his own master. Something prompted me to seize him by his long grey beard—which came off in my hand. He himself obligingly simplified matters by flinging away his wig, and so stood revealed-a handsome young scamp, with laughing black eyes and a fine double row of white teeth.
"You dirty thief!" I ejaculated.

He acknowledged the compliment by a bow and an engaging smile. "A thief I unquestionably am," he replied, "through pressure of necessity and insupportable taxation. As for dirt-che vuole? Water is not to be obtained so easily in Sicily as in your rainy island. Permit me, nevertheless, to assure you that nobody can appreciate honesty and cleanliness more highly than I do. Some day-possibly by your involuntary help-I may revert to a more civilised and congenial style of existence. Meanwhile, my dear sir, I can only offer you a rough hospitality. Happily, there is every prospect of settled weather, and, although the nights are fresh at this season of the year, my canaille will soon kindle a good "I presume," said I, "that I have the honour to be the guest of Signor Guercio."

He made a gesture of assent. "That is the sobriquet which the good people hereabouts have been pleased to bestow upon me. They might have given me a more flattering one; for the truth is that I am by nature almost culpably amiable and generous towards those who have won my sympathy. You will admit that when I tell you that I have fixed your ransom at the paltry sum of 150,000

A brief process of mental arithmetic put me in a position to gauge the extent of the fellow's impudence. "Six thousand pounds!" I cried. "Don't you wish you may get it? Even supposing that I were willing to pay that amount—which I am not—I haven't as much, nor anything like as much, available. You had better rifle my pockets and let me go; for I assure you that neither my relations nor the British Government will pay a penny for me.'

He smiled and replied suavely that he relied only upon me, not upon hard-hearted outsiders. "A man who cannot readily sell out securities to the value of 150,000 lire does not hire so fine a yacht as the Chiquita for the winter months," he added. is why I expect, when I go down to Marsala to-morrow, to carry with me the requisite instructions, signed by you. I shall then be once more Professor Abbattucci; I shall explain to your Vice-Consul that the brigands have despatched me to make arrangements on your behalf, and the moment that the cash is placed in my hands I shall hasten back to camp to release you-an affair of a week or ten days, probably,"

"And if I finally and absolutely refuse to sign any such outrageous instructions?" I inquired.

"Dear Mr. Bates," he answered, "you compel me to say things which it is most disagreeable to me to say; but the tariff in questions of this kind is well known and inexorable. A first refusal means the loss of one ear, persistent obstinacy deprives the prisoner of its fellow, and then-eh! then other features must follow suit. You will understand, I am sure, that I could not hope to maintain my authority over a set of desperadoes if I attempted to depart from established rules, and you will not, I trust, be so foolish as to nutilate yourself, in addition to losing your money. For the rest,

I give you until to morrow morning to reflect. Presently we will have some supper and banish unpleasant topics for the night.

I have often had occasion to observe with what amazing facility we mortals accommodate ourselves to unavoidable circumstances. There are many things which we assert that we will not do or cannot bear; yet, when we have to do or bear them, the task turns out to be well within the compass of our capacity. I devoured an excellent supper with an equally excellent appetite; subsequently I toasted my toes at the camp fire and enjoyed the cigar kindly provided for me by my host, as well as his conversation, which was racy, witty and instinct with knowledge of the outer world. All the same, I said to myself, "If you think you are going to extort 6,000! from me, my good friend, you little know Augustus Bates."

In point of fact, paleady knows better then I do by what had not In point of fact, nobody knows better than I do by what hard work and unremitting attention to business such a sum is laid by, and I was prepared to defend my lawful earnings even at the risk of my

Naturally I had not forgotten Cecchina's compass, nor did I despair of giving my warders the slip; but I need hardly say that that did not promise to be quite the simplest of jobs. As far as I could make out, the brigands' camp was situated in a species of natural stronghold, surrounded by beetling crags, which would have to be scaled either for purposes of ingress or egress, and even if I succeeded in evading the vigilance of the sentinels who were posted round about us when we lay down to rest, it seemed only too likely that my person (which is a somewhat bulky one) would end by standing conspicuously against the starry sky.

However, the attempt had to be made; and shortly after one o'clock in the morning it was made, in a style which I flatter myself would have done no discredit to a Red Indian. Not without some feeling of contempt for that lazy, slovenly gang did I wriggle upon my stomach past their snoring outposts, whom they had not even taken the trouble to relieve, and although, in the course of my subsequent tedious, arduous scramble, I could not help dislodging an occasional pebble or fragment of earth, not a man of them stirred in response to those tell-tale sounds. What fools they were, I thought, not to keep dogs! But it was not for me to grumble at their stupidity; and when at length I dropped deftly over the hillcrest which dominated their lair my heart was full of good-will towards them and gratitude to the admirable Cecchina. I drew her compass out of my pocket and proceeded to take bearings. From the eminence upon which I was seated a vast extent of broken, hilly country was discernible under the stars; I could even make out the sea and what I took to be Marsala, indicated by a few twinkling lights in the far distance. But the intervening villages through which we had passed I was unable to discover, nor were my eyes good enough to penetrate the dark hollows and folds of the hills, in one of which was doubtless situated the farm of my friend in need.

"Never mind !" said I, aloud; "I shall follow my nose and the compass, and if I get out of this safely, my good Cecchina, you shall hear of something to your advantage, on application to the firm of Bates and Co., Lothbury, E.C. Signor Guercio and Professor Abbattucci, I have the honour to wish you good-night and pleasant

"A thousand thanks!" answered an ironical voice close behind me; "but, dear Mr. Bates, if you wish me to sleep comfortably, you really should not compel me to waste an hour of my night's rest in following you. How could you think so poorly of my intelligence as to imagine that I would run any risk of parting with you? Oh, you had better not move! That cold, hard substance which you feel behind your ear is the barrel of your own nice new revolver, and my finger is upon the trigger."
"Take the thing away, you idiot!" I exclaimed, hastily (for I felt by no means sure that he was accustomed to the handling of such delicate weapons). "I surrender, of course; what the deuce else can I do? Only I must say that I think you might have spared me and yourself all this unnecessary fatigue, which has been worse than deer-stalking. Why didn't you?"

"Excusable curiosity," he calmly replied. "I suspected-and what you have just been obliging enough to say confirms my suspicions—that Cecchina did not cause me to look the other way while she was handing you your wine for nothing. Ah, well! I forgive her. The more willingly because she has failed, and because, if she had succeeded, her misplaced generosity would have cost her a little fortune. You have no idea, Mr. Bates, of how much may be accomplished with a capital of 6,000% in this poverty-stricken

Looking back upon it all dispassionately and at this distance of time, I am bound to admit that Cesare Soldato was an amiable, attractive sort of scamp, exhibiting at every turn that mixture of frank knavery and simplicity which is to be met with nowhere, save in the country of his birth. It may seem rather queer, considering what our actual relations were, that we should have sat down, side by side, upon the rocks, and that he should have selected that opportunity for favouring me with a candid autobiographical narrative; but he said it would perhaps interest me--and I confess that

He was by birth and education a respectable sort of person, it appeared; but, like many other respectable persons, he had always been unable to do justice to himself and his legitimate ambitions through lack of sufficient capital. Foreign travel, infinite ingenuity and a highly receptive mind had failed, one and all, to furnish him with this indispensable possession, and if he had now taken to brigandage, it was not so much for the fun of the thing (though he admitted that he enjoyed that) as by reason of the splendid successes which may be expected to fall, sooner or later, to the brigand who knows how to wait for them. Such a success, he intimated, that he now grasped in my humble person. Six thousand pounds, he remarked, might not sound much to a British capitalist; but, for his part, he was not greedy; he could make it do.
"You mean, perhaps," said I, "that that sum is the minimum which the pretty widow of the farm will accept."

He nodded assent, and was so polite as to add that I was a clever

"I cannot accept the compliment," I answered; "it seems to me that if I had been a clever fellow, Professor Abbattucci would have found it less easy to make a fool of me. Nevertheless, I have eyes in my head-which I sometimes utilise for the purpose of observing other people's eyes and the emotions which they express. I saw you gazing at the fair Cecchina; likewise I saw her gazing at you. But I frankly own that I am not quite clever enough to guess why she gave me that compass. Is she, or is she not, your confedered course, you need not answer unless you like; I merely ask is same motive to which you pleaded guilty just now ---

He laughed and made me welcome to full information subject. Cecchina, he assured me, must have been honest. to do me a good turn. Being an angel, she was not, and be, the ally of thieves; still less would she ever consent her word for that—to espouse a leader of thieves. But st. and he had some reason for hoping and believing that she consent to marry a repentant ex-handit, with six thousand; his pocket, who adored her and whom she had admitted did not personally detest. Oh! not, of course in Sicily; that be rather too risky a proceeding. But there was a con-excellent service of steamers from Messina and other potts: the mainland people who asked nothing better than to lee! reputable life would be in a position to gratify their desirefarm-which, owing to the disturbed state of the country. worth much anyhow-could be disposed of from afar quite as from the neighbourhood.

All this, at' a great deal more, he imparted to me with like candour which disarmed incredulity. By the time the made an end of speaking I could not doubt that he was g passionately in love with the charming widow, nor did I di his statement that, while she refused to have anything to an outlaw, she might prove willing to make a fresh star is the company of one who had a snug little fortune lying bankers'. He was quite serious and cornest at part of the business; he said that, much as he should regree would certainly have to lop off my ears and nose in the a. my recalcitrancy; he pointed out to me that he was in exof a gang of desperadoes, and that it would be as much as was worth to shock their prejudices by a display of a leniency. So the long and the short of it was that I gave do not see, nor did I see at the time, what else there was to do. The Peace Conference has got to work industriously during the last week. Committees and sub-committees have been formed to study the various questions on the programme, and already it is possible to forecast with some confidence, if not with absolute accuracy, the result of their labours. On the subject of Disarmament nothing seems likely to be done. In regard to the regulation of war the prospects are doubtful, but in the matter of mediation and arbitration everybody is sanguine. The Committee dealing with the latter question has three detailed schemes before it, and it seems almost certain that some sort of permanent Tribunal of Arbitration with a strictly limited jurisdiction will issue from its labours. The work of the Conference has not been unrelieved by festivity. The Hague is treating its visitors with generous and delicate hospitality. Queen Wilhelmina paid a special visit to the city in order to receive the delegates, all of whom were presented to her.

It is a stirring scene of Dervish warfa e, in which the Australians come to the rescue of the Carabineers at a time when the honour of England requires them. The Historical Pageant shows us the evolution of the British Army as marked by the four periods of the "Wars of the Roses," with its armour-clad men-at-arms and its sturdy archers; the civil wars of King and Parliament with Royalist and Roundhead, among whom are the gay cavalry of Prince Rupert and the grim black armoured "Iron sides" of Cromwell; the period of Lucknow, 1857-8, and finally the period of Khartoum. In the Lucknow section of the Pageant one of the actual guns used by Peel's Naval Brigade in the historic campaign is brought upon the scene, and in the Khartoum section march some of the men of the 21st Lancers who were in the famous charge. The driving practice of the Royal Artillery, the wrestling on horseback (always one of the most popular of the events), the tent-pegging, and the gallop in pairs around the arena, when the jumps are to be negotiated

The fighting in Samoa

THE illustrations which we publish this week show the scenes of the recent fighting. In one Lieutenant Gaunt is instructing his men in shooting with the Morris tube at Mulinuu. Lieutenant Gaunt, R.N., of H.M.S. Porpoise, it will be remembered, greatly distinguished himself in the cam-raign. While the Tauranga was shelling the rebels' position, a brigade under him captured the German flag which was flying on one of the forts, and Captain Stuart, R.N., of the Taurança, on the return of the brigade, signalled "Well done, Gaunt's brigade! In another illastration the brigade is seen on the march near Vailima. The illustration of the ambush shows the German plantation at Vailele, where a force of 214 British and Americans and 150 friendlies was surprised by the rebels, and also the road down which the little force marched just before the attack. The natives bolted, but the Marines and bluejackets stood their ground splendidly, Americans and British firing shoulder to shoulder. The re-treat was sounded three times before the party retired. Lieutenant Freeman, first l'eutenant of the Tauranga, who was in command of the force, was shot through the heart, and Lieutenant Lonsdale, of the Philadelphia, had hisleg shattered while endeavouring to fix a gun. Ensign Monaghan, also of the Philadelphia, perished in a gallant attempt to save his brother officer. They were buried in the cemetery at Mulinuu. Lieutenant Gaunt's brigade saw more fighting at the end of last month, when the rebel stronghold at Vailima was captured after it had been shelled. The name of Vailima will be familiar, as it was there that Robert Louis Stevenson lived. The house he occupied was riddled during the engagement, which practically lasted two days. Our wounded were taken to the Court House at Apia. One of the photographs shows some attendants rolling bandages for the wounded. At public functions in Samoa the native drink, called kava, is handed round in a large bowl. When the young King Malietoa was crowned, the other day, kava-drinking was an important feature in the ceremony. The preparation of the King's kava, is, as will be seen in the picture, a somewhat serious

The Royal Military Cournament

THE twentieth Royal Military Tournament is in no way inferior to those that have preceded it. Day after day, and twice every day, the vast spaces of the Agricultural Hall are filled with eager and enthusiastic crowds, whose applause is continuous as the attractive programme unfolds itself before them—riding, driving, jumping, such as can only be seen in England, processions, pageants, battle scenes, and "moving accidents by flood and field" done with a realistic "go," only to be attained by men who understand the real business of war. One of the best of the war pictures is the Cavalry display, as it is called, by the 6th Dragoon Guards (Carabiniers) and New South Wales Lancers—a happily invented and admirably arranged bit of mimic warfare wherein the Soldiers of the Queen, whether they are recruited in the Old Country or at the Antipodes,

The chiefs of the Conference delegations were received at the Royal Palace at The Hague last week and presented to Queen Wilhelmina by M. de Beaufort, Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Queen and her mother of an the delegates were presented in alphabetical order of Saint Catherine in diamonds

"Place aux Dames"

BY LADY VIOLET GREVILLE

WE in England have still much to learn in the matter of our treatment of animals. This season, the time of holiday jaunts, of merry race-meetings, of picnics, and open air drives, and all kinds of pleasant junkets, is also the time of penance for poor, over-laden, over-driven animals. The sights to be seen at the Derby, at Ascot, at Goodwood, are all painful to the tender heart. A number of men huddled in a vehicle, singing, laughing, carousing, and energetically flogging the poor, tired animal who draws them, sometimes even only a little wretched pony, must detract from the pleasure of any ordinary charitably inclined person. The hill at Goodwood used to be a piteous sight; now, I believe, the cruelty practised there is to a great extent rectified, but the Duke of Portland protests against the heavily laden brakes of excursionists who visit his park, and at all holiday resorts the spectacle is a frequent one. Nothing but the constant personal efforts of the police or the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals will stop the folly and ignorance of brutal people, who look upon a holiday as a legitimate opportunity for the torture of animals.

Among the various plans for old-age pensions and the treatment of the aged and deserving poor I have not seen one mentioned which commended itself to our charitable, if less politically consistent, forefathers. I mean the almshouse, where the aged poor passed the remainder of their days, comfortably united, tending their gardens, keeping their bees, peaceful and contented. Why should not to every workhouse be attached these pretty picturesque almshouses of our ancestors, in no wise associated with shame and disgrace, but merely the humble, happy resting places of those who have toiled all their lives, without irritating rules, restrictions, or compulsory garments of disgrace, in fact, simply homes for the aged? Private benevolence, as in old times, might do much for these almshouses, as well as the State, and the stigma of poverty and shame, so deplorably present in a workhouse, be thus removed. The natural repulsion of the poor for the workhouse, which causes the deserving to starve sooner than enter its hated portals, comes from the fact that all are herded indiscriminately together within—the industrious and unfortunate, the old and the ne'er-do-weel, the worthless and the honourably worn out. With almshouses the case is different, for to them no shame is attached.

I am glad to see that flowers as an adornment for the hair are replacing the pert aigrette and osprey which has reigned for so long. A wreath of roses is certainly the appropriate decoration for youth. It was so in the old Roman days, it was so at the beginning of Her Majesty's reign, who is represented in one of her pictures with a large wreath of white roses; it was so in poe ry, as everyone knows by the lines "She wore a wreath of roses." If some choose to adopt other flowers there is a wealth of beauty for them to choose from. Some may put "vine leaves in their hair," others laurel. A pretty idea would be to choose one's own badge, as is done at the Caledonian Ball, where every lady dancing in the Scotch quadrille wears the badge and the tartan of her clan. The laurel, the ivy, the holly, the bog myrtle all figured in the poctical furnishing of the Highlander. Why not in London society? Let a lady choose her favourite flower and wear it in her hair, either twisted into a garland or wound in her tresses, or tucked behind the ear, in the manner of long ago. Variety is charming, and flowers alone or combined with tulle and chiffon form the prettiest ornament for youthful faces.

Mr. and Mrs. Kendal produced a new play at Brighton last week by the authors of The Elder Miss Blossom. Admirably played, and affording at least one fine scene for the two gifted artists, it is not so interesting and sympathetic as the story of the dignified and affectionate Miss Blossom. The problem raised in it, too, is, to my mind, open to discussion. Is maternal love so strong in a woman who has never seen her child since its birth as to make her almost brutally ungrateful to the lover who had cherished and brought it up? Would the struggle between generosity and maternal love have been so intense, and is not the whole situation overstrained and unnatural? What creatures we are of habit we perhaps scarcely realise, nor that our affections are chiefly composed of the ties of propinquity and custom. Who in reality loves a father or a mother he has never seen except from the sentimental point of view? Should we not turn from the unknown child to the loving person who has borne with us the burden and heat of the day? Such ideas are conventional theories; they are neither founded on fact nor are they true to life.

The portals of exhibitions are open everywhere just now With amiable pertinacity they beckon us in. Exhibitions of pictures, of bric-à-brac, of statuary, of books, of freaks and mountebanks even. The price is small, to enter is easy, yet how many people are the better for all they go to see, gaping with open-mouthed curiosity, ignorant and unrefreshed. The intelligent spectator is few and far between. For the majority only a confused memory of colour, sights, and sounds remains, undigested, unclassified, and blurred. Instead of conscientiously walking through exhibitions with tired eyes and aching feet, trying to see everything and remembering nothing, let me counsel the country cousin, bent on improvement and information, to single out one or two pictures or objects, and devote his whole attention to them. He will be amply repaid. Just as the one-book man finds ever new and wonderful meanings in the already familiar and well-thumbed pages of his favourite author, so the sightseer who sees little sees well and pleasantly.

The Nate Nord Esher

ONE of the most remarkable legal and judicial careers of our time has been brought to an end by the death of Lord Esher, who died suddenly last week. He served on the Bench for nearly thirty years—a length of service only exceeded three times in the history of the Bench. The Right Hon. William Baliol Brett, Viscount Esher, was the eldest son of the late Rev. Joseph George Br.tt, of Ranelagh, Chelsea, and was born i 1817. He was educated at Westminster School and Caius College, Cambridge. At the University he was famous as an athlete, and rowed three times in the Cambridge boat. He graduated B.A. in 1840, taking his M.A. in 1845. The following year he was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn. He went the Northern Circuit and soon acquired an extensive practice in commercial cases. In 1860 he took silk, and the same year was made a Bencher of his Inn. In February, 1868, he was appointed Solicitor-General and was knighted. He retired from the Solicitor-Generalship to become a justice of Court of Common Pleas, and by the operation of the Judicature Act became a judge of the High Court of Justice in 1875. In October, 1876, he was made a judge of the Intermediate Court of Appeal, and was sworn of the Privy Council. The manner in which he discharged his duties in the Court of Appeal marked him out as the successor to Sir George Jessel as Master of the Rolls when the latter died in 1883. In 1886 Sir William Brett was raised to the Peerage in recognition of his long and meritorious services under the title of Baron Esher. When he retired in 1897 he was raised to a Viscountcy. Viscount Esher married in 1850 Eugenie, daughter of the late Mr. Louis Mayer, and is succeeded in the title by his son the Hon. Reginald Baliol Brett, who was born in 1852. The funeral took place at Esher, on Monday, when Lord Esher was buried in the family mausoleum. The monument, of which we give an illustration, was prepared by the late Peer himself many years before his death. It consists of a canopy, supported by clustered columns, under which are sculptured effigies of himself and his wife. Our illustration is from a photograph by F. W. J. Fricker, Esher. Our portrait is by Window and Grove, Baker Street.

"Tod" Sloan

DURING the last quarter of a century many "lore! have appeared on English racecourses. The United > America and the Cape have all sent horsemen to try amongst English artists of the pigskin, and at Ascot, Newmarket several of the best French horsemen have sionally seen. No one of the lot, however, created impression until James Todhunter Sloan arrived in the towards the end of 1997. Sloan had gradually worked the top of the tree in America, and his fame as a horse ceded him to this country, so that his advent was eag it for, and his riding at once became the object of much Nor can it be truthfully said that all the critics were ! at first. Last year made engagements in America which kept him in that common the common of the year. the English season was far advanced, but he re-appea Manchester September Meeting, and between that date an of the season he had ninety-eight mounts, and won forty his average again being the best of the year. This year riding at Lincoln, and has ridden at the more important which have since been held.

HOW SLOAN RIDES

Sloan's appearance when riding a race is not attractive to ! lish eyes. The horses he rides are saddled over the withers - in saddled being placed nearly six inches further forward than is the :... n in this country. Then, too, the American jockey rides with a very short stirrup, so that when mounted he is really astride the lower part of his horse's neck. When the race begins he lies in a craching position right along his horse's neck, with his hands stratched forwards on either side, each holding a rein, not more than a foot from the bit. If his horse can win without the whip being resorted to Sloan retains this position right up to the winning pest, and as long as he can "get his horse out" by the aid of his hands and his heels he is quite at home, though his position must always be an ugly one. When the whip is required the little American is not seen to so much advantage, his peculiar seat preventing him from using the whalebone as it should be used to rouse a sluggish horse, He has, of course, to grasp the reins with one hand when he uses the whip, and thus in a degree he loses his touch of his horses mouth. Neither can he flog so well on his forward seat as the English jockey who sits behind the withers in the hellow of the back. As a natural consequence of his style of riding Sloan se dom uses the whip, and in nine out of ten of his winning rides he keeps one hand on either rein until the winning-post is passed. That Sloan rides with wonderful judgment has been proved by his many successes. He has extraordinary knowledge of pace and fine hands. Horses of every variety of temperament give their best tanning when ridden by him. Rogues and "welshers" appear to go kindly in his hands, no matter how ungenerously they may have perfermed when ridden by other jockeys. Notable instances of list season may be quoted in Sea Fog, Galashiels, and St. Ia, the first mound of which had been beaten in thirteen races before Sloan took Lien in hand.

WHY HE IS A FAVOURITE

Another feature of Sloan's riding is his quickness at the art and his habit of making running. When riding sprint rays he almost invariably comes right through if his mount is good enough, and in longer races he as often makes running as not, and under any circumstances never waits far behind. Incurrent upshot is that he is seldom shut in at a critical point, it is less liable to be knocked about than a jockey who in the races out of ten waits for an opening, and if he finds one to to win by a head on the post. That Sloan should have become tremendous favourite with the British public is not to be wonder at, but there are two reasons for this adulation, and we think it best that they should be stated our The first is the natural desire on the part English crowd to applaud anyone who any physical feat, and the other is that the :. public recognise the fact that Sloan is going win whenever he rides. They know that who accept retainers for any particular stall: ride all and sundry of the horses which rest that stable, that they must take the mount the horse's chance is good, and also that they ride when the horse's chance is nil. About they know that he will not ride what is v called a "fat" horse, that whatever he to fancied, and that the little American is proto do his mount justice. Where Sloan normous pull over the pick of the English is that with a man's discretion and judgmen. can ride at a boy's weight. Within the weeks he has ridden at 7 st. 2 lb., and this ipounds less than T. Loates can ride at, more a stone less than M. Cannon can get up nearly two stone less than John Watts now In knowledge of pace, and judgment as a a race should be ridden, Sloan is the equal. we have just named, but in a close finish horses of equal chances, he is not, we think, as Watts or Cannon, the brothers S. and T. or Otto Madden. Still the American he much good to the English turf. He has experienced rottenness of the waiting system, and has cr healthy spirit of emulation which is all for to He has, moreover, made himself personally [17] and has quite overcome the prejudice which first strongly entertained about his method of the S

NINETEENTH CENTURY-III. THROUGH THE

THE STAGE AND THE DRAMA ...

By W. MOY THOMAS

EDMUND KEAN After Wageman 1818

THE early days of the century were days of theatrical monopoly under which, though our stage could boast of some performers of undoubted genius, the drama languished while the art of acting suffered no less from the absence of a wholesome rivalry. Practically, the two patent houses, Drury Lane and Covent Garden, were secured by the charters granted by King Charles II. to Killigrew and Davenant, their heirs and assigns, in the enjoyment of the exclusive right to give dramatic entertainments in London; for though "the little theatre in the Haymarket," as it was called, had contrived to encroach upon the domain of the pampered patentees under a licence from the Lord Chamberlain's office, renewed from year to year, it was not merely limited as regards the class of pieces which it was permitted to produce, but was strictly enjoined to keep its doors closed from October 15 to June 15-that is, for the best part of the theatrical year-during which period, in the words of the official licence, the theatre was "not to be opened for any species of entertainment whatever," unless it were on some particular occasion to be taken into consideration by the Lord Chamberlain. It is hardly surprising that this suppression of competition had, after nearly a century and a half, brought the drama in England to a low ebb. Sheridan, immersed in politics and conviviality, had ceased to write, and Cumberland's powers had fallen into decay. O'Keeffe, Morton and the younger Colman produced one or two comedies which have been occasionally revived in recent years; but the theatres of a century ago were mainly supplied by Matthew Gregory Lewis with his melodramatic horrors, trans-lators of Kotzebue's lachrymose and exaggerated

German "sensibility," and Dibdin, Reynolds, Cherry and some few more purveyors of silly farces and simpering sentimental comedies. Shakespeare still held his ground, it is true, in a sadly maimed and mutilated condition, but the genius of John Philip Kemble and his illustrious sister, Mrs. Siddons, sufficed to make these "acting copies," as they were called, acceptable. Both these famous performers were then in the height of their renown. The stately and imposing but still natural style and manner of Mrs. Siddons held a powerful sway over the imagination of the play-going world in those days, and Kemble's "majestic port" and command of pathos—albeit his love-making was acknowledged and command of pathos—albeit his love-making was acknowledged to lack fervour and romance—left him without an equal among the tragedians of the time. His pre eminence, however, was soon to be disputed by his great rival, George Frederick Cooke, who made his appearance on October 31, 1801, at Covent Garden as Richard III. Much as Cooke was admired, however, in many parts of first importance, he never really took rank as a great tragedian, and in John Kemble's peculiar field there was little to be feared from his rivalry. As Leslie, the Royal Academician, said, a comparison could hardly be drawn between them. "Kemble" (as he put it) "could not play Sir Pertinax McSycophant like Cooke, nor could Cooke play Pierre or Coriolanus like Kemble."

If the great success of Cooke's Richard III. appears inconsistent with this appreciation it should be remembered that it seems to have been due in no small degree to Cooke's peculiar gift for portraying craft and hypocrisy. Not the less is it true that Kemble had now—in one great part at least—a formidable competior, and that in a department in which he had for some years ruled The rise of Young, who made his first appearance as

Hamlet at the Haymarket on June 22, 1807, was more calculated to cause Kemble uneasiness; but in spite of his musical voice and grace of style, Young was never placed by competent judges on a level with his rival. If we take stock of comedians of that day the list is very far from appearing so scanty, and it must be confessed that tragic intensity ever has been one of the rarest of the actor's When Leigh Hunt, doffing the blue gown and yellow hose of the Bluecoat boy, took to studying the London stage for materials for his very remarkable little volume of dramatic criticisms published in 1807, the century could hardly have been more than two or three years old; and we find among his favourites, Bannister, the first low comedian of his day, Mrs. Jordan, with her joyous, bubbling laugh; Elliston, with his graceful affectations; Emery, unrivalled in Yorkshiremen parts; Liston, with his droll countenance; Lewis, with his airy gaiety; and Charles Kemble, most fervent and graceful of stage lovers; not to speak of the elder Mathews, Fawcett, Miss Duncan, Miss Mellon, Munden, Miss Smith and many more, who were accounted performers of note in their time. Whether they would all have satisfied the tastes of modern playgoers may be doubted. The vast stages of Drury Lane and Covent Garden encouraged—indeed, rendered unavoidable—an exaggerated style, and the playwrights, aware of this, deliberately encouraged their broadly marked eccentricities and well-known extravagances. John Kemble took his farewell at Covent Garden in his great part of Coriolanus in 1817; his famous sister had retired some five years earlier. He had lived to see the advent and experience the powerful rivalry of the great Edn.und Kean, who had the first London appearance at Drury Lane on Joney 26, 1814. Macready had also appeared always to horizon, having made his appearance two years at r at Covent Garden as Orestes. The brilliant corser of Edmund Kean-or at least its most brilliant period -is recorded in Hazlitt's discriminative but on the whole enthusiastic studies of the great actor who harst upon the play-going world of that time with such startling effect. Kean died in 1833, but his scientid powers had been falling to decay some years leave that time. The period of Kean's decline is, periods. the most depressing in the history of the stage since the Restoration. Some few names shine fortally the darkness. Brightest of all is that of Miss O'Noil, on actress, if contemporary testimony can be trusted of infinite charm and of great command of s mple patters As the old favourites dropped away their plates with only partially filled by new ones. Real water and equestrian dramas had failed to restore the telen fortunes of Covent Garden or Drury Lane. Charles Kemble's management of the latter house had stored disastrous in spite of the co-operation of his distinguished daughter, Fanny Kemble, and the managements of Mr. Alexander Lee and Captain Polhill, not to seak of their successor, "Poet" Bunn, brought up on longry Lane only ridicule and contempt. Their monopal mil existed, but for very shame they refrained, as a from prosecuting the minor houses, as they were —such as the Coburg, the Surrey, the Pavillatother playhouses in the suburbs, where, under licences granted by the magistrates, regular periods given in spite of the Killigrew and Davenant patents. The chi and the Lyccum had, moreover, contrived to get a lawful gunder licences from the Lord Chamberlain, which, however, and upon those houses vexatious conditions of the kind already red to. Braham, the great singer, had also succeeded in getting ace for the St. James's, which was built by him, and opened on taber 14, 1835. Monopoly had thus been compelled to abate of its high pretensions, but a stand at last was made in the of the little Strand theatre, whose audacious encroachments ght upon it prosecutions.

WILLIAM CHARLES MACREADY

Meanwhile the literary drama had ceased to exist, or was represented only by Sheridan Knowles, whose plays were mostly only clever imitations of the poetical dramas of the first half of the syenteenth century. The genius of the beautiful and gifted Mrs. Nisbett aided greatly in giving them vitality; but they were too artificial to sustain anything more than a passing fashion. This condition of things led at length to the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee on theatres, whose report, issued in August, 1832, contains a mass of interesting information. In 1833 an Act was passed which, for the first time, gave to dramatists a statutory protection for the acting rights in their plays; and in 1843, thanks in great part to the exertions of Sir Edward Lytton Pulwer, afterwards Lord Lytton, the Theatres Act was passed, which em owered the Lord Chamberlain to license theatres for the performance of the regular drama. Already there was a dawn of letter things. Webster's management of the Haymarket, and that of his successor, Buckstone, had kept alive the tradition of old English comedy; and Macready's memorable management of Covent Garden (1837) and Drury Lane (1841), though financially assuccessful, had, with the aid of the gifted Helen Faucit, excited great interest among the intellectual class of playgoers. It was Macready, it will be remembered, who brought out the most successful of Lord Extion's dramas. Not less encouraging was Mr. Phelps's management (1844-59) of Sadler's Wells, where that fine and scholarly actor produced with great success a long succession of Shakespeare's lays. Charles Kean's famous Shakspearean revivals at the rincess's (1850-59) tended rather to overwhelm dramatic poetry with scenic art and splendid pageantry. The management of the Lyceum by Charles Mathews and (for the greater part of his term) Madame Vestris (1847-56) helped to sustain the standard of comedy acting and to exemplify the importance of careful stage management. The Keeleys, Mrs. Stirling, Robson, Fechter, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wigan belong to this period of partial re-awakening, and to these I may add Mr. Wright, of the Adelphi, whose legitimate successor was Mr. J. L. Toole, a far more original and humorous comedian.

But the great revival of the drama and of public interest in the stage, which is so striking a feature of these times, dates from the publication, in 1855, of the Parliamentary Report which revealed the fact that, although the old monopoly of the Patent houses had been relaxed, another monopoly had taken its place owing to the great practical difficulty of obtaining licences for new houses. The theatres, it was said, were already too many. The best answer is that there are now three times as many, and, as a rule, they are better managed and more prosperous. Owing to the good sense and liberal views of the Lord Chamberlain's office, free trade in theatres was practically established in 1866, and, as theatres have multiplied, a wholesome spirit of emulation has arisen which has been beneficial in its influences alike on the art of acting, on stage management, and on play-writing. It is due to Mrs. Bancroft to say that her famous management of the Prince of Wales's, which is the true starting point of this revival, somewhat anticipated the new order of things, as indicated by the fact that when she needed a theatre she was compelled to make the best of the obscure little playhouse in the inconvenient neighbourhood of Tottenham Street, renamed by her (1865) the Prince of Wales's, where, in association with her husband, she produced, with what excellence of stage management and acting is well remembered, the series of Robertsonian comedies. The earliest of the theatres licensed under the new system were the Holborn (1866), the Queen's (1867), and the Globe (1868), followed in December of the latter year by the Gaiety, under the enterprising management of Mr. John Hollingshead. Then came the Charing Cross (1869), afterwards known as Toole's, and the Vaudeville (1870). Since then the erecting of new theatres has gone on at an accelerated pace, and we have now in London some fifty houses devoted to the regular drama.

In the history of the great movement which has resulted in restoring the stage to the favour of the cultivated classes, Sir Henry Irving must always occupy the most conspicuous place. At first, as the leading actor in the Lyceum company under the

Tooth-crowning is the best method for saving decayed teeth and roots to render them serviceable for mastication and articulation. It is a simple and successful operation for restoration. It was and successful operation for restoration. It was among the first dental operations attempted, and now holds the foremost place in Dentistry. The exposed position of the teeth renders them liable to be broken off by accident, or to decay through neglect and other causes. The deformity caused by the loss of a conspicuous tooth favours the desire for its replacement as near to nature as possible. Tooth-crowning supplies the want. It is distinctly art concealing art." The decayed roots are properly treated, the crown is fitted to the root so as to closely join it, is hermetically sealed and firmly attached, and there is no operation in dentistry attached, and there is no operation in denistry which so delights the patient. An extended form of tooth-crowning is bridgework, which one of the highest dental authorities says. "fills a place second to no other system of dentistry." It provides for the fitting of teeth without plates, and is a combination of tooth-crowns. For teeth not sufficiently decayed to need crowning gold-filling is a most satisfactory operation. Gold-foil is condensed into the cavity and contoured to the natural shape of the tooth. forming a permanent plug and lasting operation. management of the late Mr. Bateman, and then as lessee and manager of that prosperous house, he has for eight-and-twenty years devoted his genius to the drama, and made first-nights at the Lycoum events of widespread interest. In these results, no doubt, that immensely popular actress, Miss Ellen Terry, must claim a share; but it is none the less to the histrionic gifts, the bold enterprise, the sagacious judgment, and the standard of excellence of Sir Henry Irving that we owe the high position of the Lyceum Theatre in the estimation of the play-going public of these days. This is not the place to estimate the services that this distinguished actor and manager has rendered to the drama and the stage. The leading facts of his brilliant career are familiar to all who have any taste for theatrical entertainments, and now that he has found some relief from the labours and anxieties of practical management, who does not indulge the hope that the Lyceum stage, with which his name is and ever must be associated, will be for him the scene of future triumphs not less brilliant than those of the past.

A complete survey of the stage in these days would be a task far beyond my allotted limit of space; but a glance at some of its leading features will not be out of place. While some enthusiasts are clamouring for State or municipal aid for the support of model theatres it must be obvious that dramatic entertainments have, under the influence of a healthy emulation, made advances that few were bold enough to hope for fifty years ago. Great genius, no doubt, continues to be rare on the stage as elsewhere; but the general level of acting, and the arts of stage management, have undergone a marked improvement. There are, no doubt, playgoers of coarse tastes. Melodramas, farces, and so-called musical comedies, now much in favour, are certainly not entertainments of a high class; but what is to be borne in mind is that there is still a large and intelligent public ready, and indeed eager, to offer encouragement to what is worthy. The sustained prosperity of the Lyceum, and the brilliant success of the management of Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft, first at the Prince of Wales's and then at the Haymarket, cannot be explained on any other assumption, not to speak of the refined and finished productions which characterise the rule of Mr. Beerbohm Tree at Her Majesty's, Mr. George Alexander at the St. James's, Messrs. Harrison and Cyril Maude at the who furnish what is, perhaps, the best evidence of their faith in the literary quality of their productions, by giving them to the world not merally as playe to be seen but as books to be read. not merely as plays to be seen but as books to be read.

An Artistic Canserie

By M. H. SPIELMANN

THE published lists of the awards of the Salon bear out the prophecy that was made some weeks ago-that the best painters were keeping back their best things in order to be able to make a strong exhibition next year. As it is, not a single first-class medal

Serions loss is caused to the Italian Customs revenue by smugglers from Switzerland, who do a considerable trace in tobacco and other contraband articles. Italian gunboats are therefore kept on Lake Maggiore for the prevention of smuggling. The sight of gunboats lying off such a peaceful spot as Cannobio strikes a traveller as very out of keeping with the beautiful surroundings. Our illustration is from a sketch by J. Agard Evans has been awarded; while among the recipients of the others there appears the name of no English artist of importance and reputation. English painters are not in very good odour, perhaps, and the treatment of Frenchmen in London has not tended to smooth matters much; but it is doubtful if any consideration other than strict justice has dictated the decision of the jury.

A much more serious matter in its way is moving our artistic community to anger-a matter so hopeless that it seems as if all the efforts of the Government and the Royal Academy would prove powerless. The space offered to us in the Paris Centennial Exhibition for the Art Section is so derisively inadequate that it almost seems as though there were no desire in France that English Art should be well represented. There is actually room for the more than three hundred pictures, and the court set asid: sculpture has aroused the ire of our representatives, by reason of equal inadequocy.

Two Academicians contributing two works apiece will fill up he the space, so that the body of selected outsiders are likely to have little chance of a show at all. The Academy practically have affair in hand—its President is chairman, and its Secretary serves affair in hand—its President is chairman, and its Secretary serves a similar capacity; it seems hardly likely, therefore, that the Secretarists, as a school, and the "modern" outsider will be able to so much as an invitation. If the French authorities maintain the non-passumus in view of the enormous space they have retained for the scaling they should be made to understand they are they should be made to understand they are they should be made to understand they are they are they should be made to understand they are th themselves they should be made to understand that noth but a partial representation of English art is to

The Velasquez Tercentenary Exhibition in Sev? :is not only in logical sequence to the Rembra. collection at Amsterdam, but it is a delightful eve: in itself, which ought to draw artistic Europe to Spain. There is an appropriatences, too, in t. place occupied by the exhibition of Velasq between those of the two masters of Flanders, w. which State Spain had at one time such intimate concern. A Velasquez collection has already by the spoken of for next year at the Guildhall. That sure an event would be extremely popular there is not ti slightest doubt; but although it is claimed that v have in England as many canvases by the maas Spain has herself, numbers must not misled us into imagining that they are of corresponding importance.

The exhibition of repoussé silver-work by Mr. Gilbert Marks at the gallery of the Fine Art Society will remind the art public that there are one or two men amongst us who are not only willing last able to raise the art of the silversmith to the height it once occupied. Such an exhibition is a concrete protest against the wholesale "Birmingham" nechine-made silver, with which even men of taste are at the present day willing to load their table-obje of poor design, stamped by the score, the hundred, the thousand-a distant echo of the model which some designer wrought years and years ago. Mr

Marks practises the arts of the fine smith-he designs and draws, produces his own dainty and often symbolical fancies upon the silver, beats it up with his own hands. It is too soon to say that Mr. Marks is destined to develop into an artist like Paul Lameric, but that he has equally deserved success, honour, and remembrance will be evident to any who examine his work and realise the spirit with which it has been undertaken, and the obstacles which he has had to face. There are some few points on which manufacturers and trade-unions make common cause: that in which a working silversmith makes every piece an original work of art, and makes it all himself, is one. It is for the lover of the beautiful and the "patron" of art to encourage such a struggle as this exhibition clearly typifies.

New Novels

"THE NEWSPAPER GIRL"

"Some of the people, some of the incidents," says Mrs. C. N. Williamson in her dedication to her "first edition" of "The Newspaper Girl" (C. Arthur Pearson), "you will recognise; those that never were, and perhaps never could be, may cause you a smile." If that first editor of hers has—as the literary discoverer with the Newspaper was hardly fell to have a surroughty with of Mrs. Williamson can hardly fail to have-a sympathy with youthful high spirits and an author's evident enjoyment of her own work, the smile is inevitable, and it will be a smile of pleasure. The situation on which the story is based is the not unprecedented whim of a rich and beautiful heiress from Colorado, who, in order to keep clear of a fortune hunter, exchanges identities with a struggling young lady journalist, bound for London. So it comes to pass that the supposed heiress is drowned at sea, and that the real heiress finds her whim change into very serious business indeed. How, by her pluck and resourcefulness, she saves the editor of a great leading journal from a villainous conspiracy, and unites the rôles of good fairy and princess of romance under the garb of just a "Newspaper Girl," Mrs. Williamson tells, as we have said, with a contagious zest, and a complete triumph over the most discouraging improbabilities. In short, she grasps her nettle-and her readers besides.

"UNTIL THE DAWN"

"Until the Dawn," by S. E. Walford (Chapman and Hall), is the story of a mysterious murder, committed, as is not unusual in such cases, by a very unlikely person under very unlikely circumstances. It has not, indeed, been the author's purpose to keep the reader in the dark; though none the less the pleasure of neophytes in the art of novel-reading, must not be spoiled by disclosure at second hand. The purpose of the restance is least a read and are the reader in the restance of the res second hand. The purpose, as we gather it, is less to ravel and unravel a circumstantial tangle than to oppose a current belief in the necessary transmission to children of their parents' worse qualities, and the injustice to which—in theory at least—such a belief tends to cause. On this subject much manly good sense is represented by S. F. Walford's hero. Without being especially well constructed, the story is at any rate of quite as much interest as any habitual novel reader is likely to require reader is likely to require.

"FRANK REDLAND, RECRUIT"

Despite its title, Mrs. Coulson Kernahan's "Frank Redland, Recruit" (John Long) is anything but a military novel. Indeed, a single page alone represents the experiences of a taker of the Queen's shilling. It is an amiable little story of true love—so simply true that the roughnesses of its course are of no more real moment to the lovers then are the rough in a torrest to a hind moment to the lovers than are the rocks in a torrent to a bird. Fanchette Lafitte, at any rate, the half-French heroine, who becomes a woman without losing the soul of a child, flies over them with innocent ease. Altogether, there is a poetical quality about the work which gives it a character of its own, and exempts it from the criticism due to realistic prose.

"THE CONFOUNDING OF CAMELIA"

The claims of the "young person" are unusually well recognised in Anne Douglas Sedgwick's awkwardly named novel, "The Confounding of Camelia" (William Heinemann). Camelia is herself a young person with some very deplorable though by no means uncommon traits-notably a want of consideration for truth as well as for other people. None the less she has a heart, and this -need it be said? - is given to the only man who, while loving her despite his judgment, sees through her, never loses an occasion of telling her what he thinks of her, and finally gives her such a moral shaking as to shake her into a better girl. These scoldings should prove edifying to youthful readers who may precive in themselves any Camelia-like tendencies, and will care by gratify the more numerous class of persons who may observe millar tendencies in others. The success of the process, how wer, fails to inspire us with much compassion, for the two disting asked statesmen-one representing the Government, the other the Objectionhad to yield her to her rugged and middle-aged Merca. If she continues to enjoy his scoldings after marriage, will red good. But will she? Should her biographer give us a sequel by way of answer, it will not be unwelcome.

The Theatres

By W. MOY THOMAS

MISS JENNIE LEE, the creator of the character of "Jo," received a benefit on Tuesday at the Prince of Wales's Theatre. It is nearly thirty years ago since Miss Jennie Lee became famous as "Jo," in an adaptation of Dickens's "Bleak House," and at the benefit she once more appeared in the part in a small selection from the play. The programme was a very long one, and among thosewho contributed their services were Miss Ellen Terry and Mr. Frank Cooper, who gave their clever little dialogue, Variations; Mr. Cyril Maude and Miss Winifred Emery, who ap-peared in a satirical little sketch, The Ordeal of the Honeymoon; Mr. Brandon Thomas and Miss Lottie Venne, who

Bill; and Mr. Fuller Mellish and Miss de Silva, who gave an Idyll of Seven Dials. Assistance was also lent by Mr. Beerbohm Tree, Mrs. Kendal, Miss Geneviève Ward, Mr. George Grossmith, Mr. Lewis Waller, Mrs. Langtry and Mr. Courtice Pounds.—Our portrait is by Elliott and Fry, Baker Street.

"THE UPPER HAND" AT TERRY'S THEATRE

The "upper hand," which gives the name to Messrs. Winthrop and Lisle's comedy, brought out at TERRY's Theatre on Monday afternoon, is the hand of a scoundrel named Philip Barwell, who, not content with ruining and abandoning a poor girl named Hester Penfold, threatens to disgrace a certain Lady Shackleford by divulging the secret that his victim is her illegitimate daughter. The price which he demands for his silence is that Lady Shackleford shall favour his scheme for marrying Mrs. Vivian, a rich young widow, and shall also-for Lady Shackleford is a very clever, popular, and shall also—for Lady Shackleford is a very clever, popular, and influential personage—do all in her power to promote Barwell's candidature for the honour of representing the borough of Cheynewood in Parliament. These circumstances, however, though set forth with much emphasis and elaboration, have really little to do with the author's story. Lady Shackleford takes no account of her persecutor's threats, and as a fact nothing comes of them, for Parliaments is himself in the proposed statement of them, for the proposed statement of them. Barwell is himself in a far more perilous position than the lady he so brutally menaces, since the unhappy Hester is hovering about the premises, not to speak of Charles Cheyne, an old flame of Mrs. Vivian's, whose name he has fraudulently assumed for the purpose of deceiving his victim regarding his identity. From this point the rather intricate plot of the piece turns simply upon a case of mistaken identity. Mrs. Vivian, who has allowed her old flame to renew his suit, and has even accepted his offer of marriage, is by an unfortunate series of coincidences led to believe that Hester's an unfortunate series of coincidences led to believe that Hester's betrayer is identical with Charles Cheyne, whose name he has betrayer is identical with Charles Cheyne, whose name he has adopted; whereupon, in the impulsive manner of stage heroines, Mrs. Vivian, disregarding his protestations of innocence, dismisses the man of her choice with bitter reproaches. As the explanation, however, and consequently the defeat of Barwell's base machinations, must obviously be arrived at whenever Cheyne and his alleged victim are confronted, it is difficult for the spectator to feel any anxiety regarding the denoting which necessarily comes as a any anxiety regarding the denoment which necessarily comes as a foregone conclusion. Messrs. Winthrop and Lisle's plot, in fact, though woven with some amount of ingenuity, belongs purely to stage land, and is not to be associated with anything of which we have experience outside the playhouse walls. A similar observation applies to the personages, though Lady Shackleford, the experienced woman of the world, with her smart sayings and her decisive tone and manner, is, in the person of Miss Fanny Brough, an old and manner, is, in the person of Miss Fanny Brough, an old acquaintance whom we are glad to meet again, albeit the author's attempt to impart an emotional tinge to her character is—owing chiefly to the manifest artificiality of the situation—not particularly happy. A crowded audience, consisting in great part of fashionable folk, indulgently extended to the play a cordial welcome; but the authors prudently declined an invitation to present themselves before the footlights. before the footlights.

Mr. Walter Crane and his associates are looking forward with great interest to the new masque which they have undertaken to present, in conformity with Elizabethan and Jacobean conditions, in the Guildhall of the City of London before the close of the present month. As is well known, the City Guilds used to be renowned for these old pageants, but Mr. Crane's scheme will doubtless throw into the shade the efforts of those simple-minded days. The leading feature of the Guildhall entertainment will be "A Vision of Fair Cities," commencing with Thebes and ending with Paris. London is to presented as the Cinderella of the family till she is rescued from her former dingy state to take her place with the rest of the "fair cities"—all which, no doubt, refers to the wonderful transformation of our street architecture that has been going on for many years, and is still in active progress.

It is good news that Mr. Charles Wyndham has chosen to complete his season at the CRITERION with a revival of Rosemary, in which he will, of course, sustain his original part of Sir Jasper Thorndyke. Messrs. L. N. Parker and Murray Carson's quaintly pretty play has the sovereign quality of imagination, and is decidedly one of the most original pieces of modern times. It is on this occasion that Mr. Wyndham will take his farewell of this prosperous theatre, which has been under his direction for three-and-twenty years. The entire receipts are to be handed over to a dramatic charity.

Mr. Beerbohm Tree is actively engaged in organising his great bazaar for the benefit of the Charing Cross Hospital, which is to be held on the 21st and 22nd inst. More than a hundred authors and other public personages have contributed letterpress or drawings to the souvenir volume, which has been prepared for the occasion, and will be sold at the price of half a guinea. As the corcuited will be sold at the personnel of the solding a first edition of 3000 colors, it that this part of the solding results, it already see that way to some promises we for the scheme promises we for the fund. The cover of the book has been designed by Mr [1] and the cover of the cover

Danton"

In placing these volumes before the public, both authors are actuated by the same motive, viz., the rehabilitation of the character of Danton. They both agree that justice has never been accorded him. He has been described as the "Cataline of the Revolution," as the "blatant Danton," as the "monster," and one writer preas the "platant Danielli as the house," and he is "going to faces his notebook on the Revolution by saying that he is "going to describe the beast." Both of these authors agree, though, in saying that Danton loved, before all else, his country, and put forth all his energy, all his strength, to make it powerful and its people contented.

Mr. Belloc writes :-

His faults—and they were many—his vices (and a severe critic would have discovered them also) flowed from two sources; first, he was too little of an idealist, too much absorbed in the immediate thing; secondly, he suffered from all the evil effects that abundant energy may produce—the habit of oaths, the rhetoric of sudden diatribes, violent and overstrained action, with its subsequent demand for represe. demand for repose

It was not until the nation was attacked, until danger threatened from within and without, that Danton showed his real strength:-

For thirteen months, from that roth of August, 1792, which he made, to the early autumn of the following y ar, Danton, his spirit, his energy, his practical grasp of things as they were, formed the strength of France. While the theorists, from whom he so profoundly differed, were wasting themselves in a kind political introspection, he raised the amies. When the orators could only find great phrases to lead the rage against Dumouriez treason, he formed the committee to be a dictator for a falling nation.

Danton cannot be held responsible for the September massacres. Whether he could have done anything to stop them is doubtful. At the time they began at Carmes, Danton was making his last effort to turn the anger of the moment into an enthusiasm for the Champ de Mars and the volunteers. It was then he made his famous speech, which closed with the historical words regarding the enemies of France: "Pour les vaincre, pour les atterrer, que faut-il? De Planton: a Study." By Hilaire Belloc, B.A. (Nishet.) "The Life of Vanton," By A. H. Beesly. (Longmans.) l'audace, encore de l'audace, toujours de l'audace-et la France est

The speech that Danton made when opposing Cambon, who sauvée. wanted to separate the State from what remained of the Church, to break the vow of 1790, should stamp him as a man not wholly to break the vow of 1790, should stamp nin as the following passage bereft of feeling, as some would paint him.

The following passage Belloc says, "better is beautiful, almost poetic, and is, as Mr. Belloc says, fitted to the defence of an older and stronger thing than the wretched constitutional priesthood ":-

It is treason against the nation to takenway its dreams. For my part, I admit, I have known but one God—the God of all the world and of justice. I admit, I have known but one God—the God of all the world and of justice. I all the man in the fields adds to this conception that of a man who works, whom he makes sacred because his youth, his manhood, and his old age owe to the priest their little moments of happiness. When a man is poor and wretched, his priest their little moments of happiness. When a man is poor and wretched, his soil grows tender, and he clings especially to whatever seems majestic: leave soil grows tender, and he clings especially to whatever seems majestic: leave soil grows tender, and he clings to but do not let the poor feel that him his illusions—teach him if you will . . . but do not let the poor feel that they may lose the one thing that binds them to earth, since wealth cannot bind them.

Mr. Belloc's drawing of Danton is vivid and lifelike; we fe.l that we have a clearer insight into the mind of the Revolutionist; in fact, that the true Danton is revealed to us.

In looking back to the causes of the Revolution in Mr. Beesly's volume, we can only be surprised that it did not come earlier:

A people rebels when it is misgoverned, or starves. The French people were both starved and misgoverned. The writings of Voltaire and B. aumarchais killed many super-titions. The writings of Kousseau created many yearnings. The imbecility of the Court surpassed te hopes of its most sancting enemies. But each of these factors in the Revolution, and all of them put together, might not improbably have failed to revolutionise France, if it had not been for the profound misery and degravation of the Franch profile.

In ten years the population diminished one-third. In 1709 a curé entered in his parish register, "I certify to all those whom it may concern that all the persons who are named in this parish register have died of famine, with the exception of M. Discrots and his daughter." And adds, "The people have been eating dead carrion for a fortnight past; there is no corn, and women have smothered their children for dread of having to feed them." The penal code was of merciless severity. Torture was still employed. Men were still broken on the wheel. Flogging and branding were the common punishments for smuggling such necessaries as salt. Peasants were forbidden to weed or hoe when there were young partreuse manure which might injure their flavour if they fed on a s nourished, to mow before a certain time or take away such they should lack shelter. Mr. Beesly says:—

June 3 19-7

they should lack snelter. Mr. Beesly says:

In shocking contract to all this wretchedness was the cold-blooded the nobles and their impunity for all sorts of crime. In 1783, at a of the Revolution, the Duc of Béthune's carriage ran over a gir his air Amid the shrieks of the cold's mother he exclaimed, without getter the woman come to my house, she will be paid for her loss." But the woman come to my house, she will be paid for her loss." But reign the Conte de Charolais amused himself with sho titing some she reign the Conte de Charolais amused himself with sho titing some she however, was too much even for Louis XV., and he warned the Comet committed any fresh offence he would pardon anyone who killed the committed any fresh offence he would pardon anyone who killed the content of the last circumstance.

The last six months of Danton's life were a single-hand of the under hopeless conditions. The writer tells us that the confronting him had no d sire for peace abroad, because an excuse for keeping up revolutionary despotism at hom . ! having no personal amb tion, craving only for himself country life, would have concluded peace, would have r normal Government, would have fostered trade and industrial law, equal chances of education, and enough to eat. The the three things which, in Danton's eyes, constituted the second a Republic,

In telling us "Why Danton failed," he says :--

In telling us "Why Danton failed," he says ;—

Unfortunate'y in one tring, without which greaties is not surroup; he was lacking. Though magnificently energetic in an energy now constitutionally painstaking. He was over-sanguline and unment of the say a lonely simile, he had the invention of the architect, the latter builder, but was without the sleepless vigilance of the lock of woods, had plenty of friends, but no party. When in his independ now here release of Vincent and Ronsin, when he deprecated Rüther the Commune, he thought he was considerating over-despote tention and in reality he was warning and arming his senenies against himself to believe that he would tall a victim to the most bring himself to believe that he would tall a victim to the most shallow scoundicts. And, indeed, there is something in the most selequence, and popularity having been discomfitted by such Latter interest, something grote que and monstrous in his having be a executive charge of conspiracy with the foreigner against France.

Kural Notes

THE "MERRY MONTH"

MAY, we are all rejoiced to say it, is over, and with that miserable month we have done with our sodden, sullen, dismal, deadly English spring. "Now," says the poet, "now doth the vernal impulsion make musical all that has language." But what music and what language it perhaps were well not to inquire. The language of farmers assuredly is not "the language of flowers," and with the cereal crops at lower prices than have prevailed for some seasons, it is a national disaster to know that there is scarcely any chance left of either wheat or barley being average crops. Nor will the loss be made up on fruit, which will be poor in the case of almost all the orchards, and also of the plantations of bush fruit. Oats and the pastures may yet give good results, and the hop gardens, though extremely backward, would probably fully recover after a few weeks of steady sunshine. But the agricultural year cannot now, as a whole, be a good one, and the health of stock, especially lambs, leaves much to be desired.

SCOTLAND

The North of Britain of recent years has not infrequently enjoyed mild and pleasant weather when South Britain has been in the grasp of frost. In 1893, and again last year, when remarkably dry weather prevailed all over England, all Scotland, except the southeast, had a full average rainfall. This spring, however, the conditions prevailing in London have ruled throughout the United Kingdom. The night frosts experienced in the metropolitan area have extended not only to the West of England, but also to Ireland, and in Scotland they have been very severe, accompanied by frequent showers of sleet in the early morning and late evening, and attended in the Highlands on the 16th inst. by a somewhat heavy fall of snow. Under these circumstances spring sowings are extraordinarily late, and it is to be feared that neither of oats or barley will a full area now be sown. The lambing season is the a many years, and on the uplands the deaths both of curs lambs amount to absolute disaster. Higher prices for beat and potatoes are some compensation for present trough wheat, barley and oats are all selling at much less many was attainable a twelvemonth ago, and this despite the falling off in prospects.

"MAIDSTONE"

The entries for the great show of the year at Maidston: completed, as, although it does not open till the 19th it entries have to be in by the end of May. There is, we set to say, a falling off in five sections out of the six, and this the show being held this year within a forty-five minutes' r journey of London. The total display will include, however, horses, 683 cattle, 631 sheep, 147 pigs, 669 fowls, 625 ex produce; a truly prodigious show in any case.

A Disordered Liver.

That yellowy look and Billous Headache must be ascribed to a Disordered Liver, and likewise all such ills as: Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dizziness, Flashes of Heat, Nausea, Drowsiness, Acid Eructations, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Coated Tongue, Black Specks floating before the Eyes, Pains in the Back and Shoulders, Constipation, Loss of Appetite, Furred Tongue, and Muddy Complexion.

A mere purgative is insufficient and of temporary assistance only. The Liver must be "touched." Carter's Little Liver Pills act directly upon the Liver. Carter's Little Liver Pills regulate the secretion of bile. Liver Pills regulat They do not gripe.

A normal Liver means a bright eye, clear complexion, good appetite and digestion, strong nerves, energy, and a light heart—in a word, HEALTH.

Take care of your health; the ill effects of excess can be avoided by a little forethought.

Remember at hedtime—Carter's Little Liver Pills: dose, One at night, but the first night take three. Is 1½1,40 in a phial. Of all chemists, BUT BE SURE THEY ARE CARTER'S.

They "Touch" the Liver.
